

INVALID PLUNGES OUT OF WINDOW, SURVIVING HURTS

Lands on Spikes Sixty Feet
Below and Is Terribly Injured.

Although Walter Simpson has pneumonia and is suffering from a compound fracture of the thigh, four broken fingers, a scalp wound, a dislocated shoulder and internal injuries, he is still alive, after jumping six floors from an apartment house and striking a row of iron spikes. What is more, he has a chance to recover from his sickness and from his hurts. Simpson is an art dealer on West Broadway. He is forty-one years old, small, wiry and slight of frame. For three days he has been in a serious condition from pneumonia at his home on the top floor of the apartment house at No. 18 Broadway avenue. To-day he became widely delirious and tried to leave his bed. His wife, a slender, little woman, was alone with him. Mrs. Simpson grasped with the invalid, but, although weakened by sickness, he broke her clutch after a hard struggle, and before she could reach him and renew the fight, he had leaped headlong through an open window of the sickroom to the sidewalk, sixty feet below.

In his fall the sick man struck the iron railings of the area railing a glancing blow, which ripped his scalp. Mrs. Simpson tore down the stairs, screaming at every step. She reached the street level just as Policeman Callahan ran up. The wife, frantic with grief, tried to throw herself upon her husband's body, crying, "Let me die, too." Neighbors gathered about the house until the street was blocked. While Callahan was applying first aid remedies to the unconscious victim and some of Mrs. Simpson's fellow tenants were trying to calm her, an ambulance made a record run from the Washington Heights Hospital.

JURY IS DENOUNCED BY JUDGE FAWCETT

The members of a jury who returned a verdict in a case before Judge Fawcett in the County Court, Brooklyn, today, will remember for a long time the scathing words of the judge, in which he reprimanded his opinion of their decision and themselves. It was about as searching a rebuke as a jury ever got from a judge.

George Holtz had been tried on a charge preferred by a fourteen-year-old girl. The girl testified against Holtz in detail. Luke O'Reilly, counsel for the accused man, put in no defense. The jury was out twenty-two minutes and returned a verdict of "not guilty."

Thereupon Judge Fawcett, his face flushed and his voice vibrant with indignation, stood up and issued only a few remarks.

"Jurymen," he said, "you are a disgrace to this community and to yourselves. I hope you have no mothers, or fathers, or daughters, or sisters to face when you go home after liberating such a man as this."

"His picture is in the Rogues' gallery. He has boasted of his crime against this child. You men have acted like fools, or worse."

"I will never willingly accept any of you as a juror again. The simple mention of the fact that you served in this case will excuse you from jury duty in the future in any court where I have jurisdiction."

The judge said more of the same tenor and parrot. As the jurors sneaked out of court they looked to be about a foot and a half tall each.
